The effects of intracerebroventricular (ICV) infusion of a cell-permeable cAMP analogue, dibutyryl cAMP (dbcAMP), on hypothalamic neuropeptides related to the control of stress hormone release were examined in conscious sheep by sampling the trunk blood at 20-min intervals for 2 h. After ICV administration of 60 nmol/L dbcAMP, plasma concentrations of immunoreactive corticotropin-releasing hormone (irCRH) increased to 121 +/- 21% over basal values at 1 h, whereas plasma growth hormone-releasing hormone (irGHRH) increased by 95 +/- 7% over basal. Plasma concentrations of immunoreactive somatostatin (irSOM) decreased by about 50% during the 2 h after dbcAMP infusion. The release pattern of these three hypothalamic neuropeptides was in concordance with the irCRH response, but not with the irGHRH or irSOM response. Interestingly, infusions of dbcAMP, CRH, GHRH, and dbcAMP plus CRH or dbcAMP and GHRH did not increase plasma cortisol concentrations. ICV infusions of prostaglandin E1 (10 and 50 microg) and phosphodiesterase type IV inhibitor rolipram (200 microg) did not change irCRH concentrations, whereas dexamethasone (1 and 4 mg, both ICV) decreased plasma irCRH by 28 and 66%, respectively. However, dexamethasone also decreased ir
